

To think about what is real

21st November 2008

Once there was a worm who had never been on the ground before. She had spent her whole life underground. She had spent her whole life underground. She had seen bird's beaks pierce the soil and snatch up any unfortunate creatures. She had heard of people treading on worms, bugs being drowned out by the rain and children daring each other to eat worms. The thought of these things made her shudder This made her not know about anything about the world. Burrowing animals such as mole, foxes, fairy armadillos would tell her about all the amazing features of the world and how they end up somewhere new every day. Worm thought about this, but she knew there was nothing there.so much that she stayed as far down in the soil.

What is my story trying to teach?

My story is trying to say that you can't waste your life watching the telly. The "outside world" is immensely important.